I. Introduction

"... Yet everything that touches us, you and me, takes us together as a bow's stroke does,
that out of two strings draws a single voice.
Upon what instrument are we two spanned?
And what player has us in his hand? ... "

Rainer Maria Rilke, Love-Song

The wisdom of the soul reveals itself most explicitly when we enter into a union of souls with another person. This person is waiting with a message, a lesson for us, which we urgently need for our further development. It is solely for this purpose that we fall in love, it is only for this reason that we bind our being to this individual and allow ourselves to become emotionally or existentially dependent on this person. The encounter with a person who exerts a great influence on the rest of our lives, however, only comes about when we are ready for it in our deepest being. In respect to experience, our conscious will and our most pressing desires have little effect on what "happens to us" in a general sense. Whether it is a matter of encountering our own child for the first time, or whether it concerns our partner for life or a business partner, this is of lesser significance at the level of the soul. Experiences with our siblings, with long-standing friendships, with our roommates or with business rivals offer us opportunities - pleasant or unpleasant - to grow spiritually and to mature internally. Each of these persons brings us in touch with a different aspect of our own nature. In the one case, it can be our independent and freedom-loving side which gains expression, in the other case, our steady and conscientious side. With the one individual we become involved in a turbulent power struggle, with the other we learn to cope with the demands of daily life. Many themes in our soul's curriculum are easier to deal with in the form of intensive teamwork among colleagues as opposed to an intimate relationship. Other persons, on the contrary, require the deep union of souls typical between parents and their children.

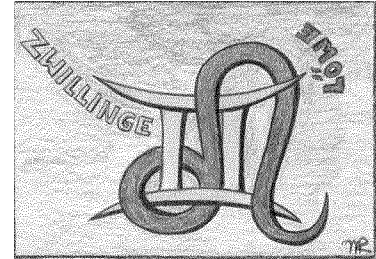

But what are we internally ready for at the moment of our first encounter? Which experiences are possible with this individual? What role should they play in our life and what role should we play in theirs? What kind of conflicts can we expect and where does our potential lie?

All of these are questions which we attempt to approach with the help of astrology. This horoscope analysis can not only help find answers to such questions, it can also help us to view our relationships from a different perspective for the first time.

II. Role Casting

Like any two-person piece performed on stage, it is not only the roles of the two actors which are set beforehand. The theme preoccupying the two protagonists, as well, is at least sketched out in advance, allowing them to bestow a conscious orientation, a character to their figures. When the soul proves to be the director of our private two-person dramas in interpersonal relationships, it utilizes the symbolic power of archetypal images and themes. The dramas within ourselves revolving around passion, self-assertion, responsibility or the ability to gain insight are as ancient as humanity itself. Every new partnership awakens such an ancient myth within us and thus gives us the strength and wisdom of its heroes and heroines for our further journey.

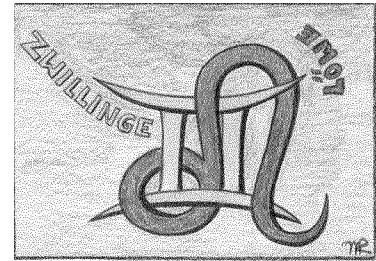

You are bound together by a striving for knowledge and wisdom, for order and clarity, by the search for meaning and insight. Together, it will be possible for the two of you to advance into the realm of the mind and to move freely within it. The various perspectives you will be operating on can create conflicts between such contrasts as knowledge and belief, rationality and intuition, doubt and hope, truth and deception, or chaos and order. Without a deep understanding for the motivations which compel individuals with completely different attitudes to shape their destinies, you will lack sympathy and a love of your neighbor - two qualities which must be especially protected in this partnership. John will usually adopt the role of the initiator who attempts to grasp and describe things in life. His desire to learn, his vast wealth of knowledge and the ability to transmit it are essential aspects of your common efforts.

The relationship with Jacqueline brings John into contact with his serious and responsible sides. Occasionally, he may feel a lack of freedom or inhibited. During such phases, John can appear sullen and might react inconsiderately or even narrow-mindedly. He would like to get at the bottom of the matters concerning him, and for this reason he is not interested in dealing with superficial items. John's goal-orientation and perseverance may make him seem slower than the rest from time to time, but he has good chances of reaching his aims.

On the way towards recognizing and understanding the things of life, Jacqueline is assigned the task of establishing contexts of meaning and interpretation so that knowledge can be transformed into wisdom or wealth. Her attention is focused less on insignificant matters and details - she is much more interested in challenging undertakings, in leaving borders behind and always seeking the optimum in all situations. When John rallies the information to her about what exists in the world and how it exists in its special form, Jacqueline then takes up the task of determining why this is the case, what the sense behind it all is and what use - perhaps a material use - can be made of it. It is not always the highly abstract things of this life which command your time and interest, however. At a more profane level, money could also play a not particularly unimportant role. As long as you follow your ideals, your common efforts could very well be profitable for both of you. Common property and possessions will in any case arise from the material or ideal contribution each of you makes to this partnership.

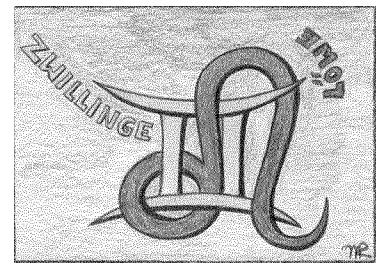

Since Jacqueline comes into contact with her instinctual, unfathomable and investigative sides in this relationship, she will feel magically drawn to deeply suppressed, secretive and hidden matters. The intensive experience of deeply felt transformation, the ordeals of healing processes concerning death, birth and transformation, the merciless confrontation with feelings of power and powerlessness, and facing the extremes within her own being will prove to be valuable experiences for Jacqueline. By learning to accept her fate with self-possession and confidence, Jacqueline will gain sufficient inner strength to make even more progress in her development.

III. Main Theme

The deep desire for mutual complementation unites both of you - including the hope it brings of harmonious togetherness. Each partner represents personality aspects which the other is lacking. The tension generated by your contrasts aims to be and must be discharged - it produces the amount of energy both of you need to deal with essentials within your relationship, with all its pitfalls and challenges.

Every relationship between individuals who feel bound to each another by a union of souls and who, as a result, become implicated in emotional and material dependencies, is characterized by a life theme extremely important for both partners. The main theme of a relationship runs through the partnership like a gold thread. It shows what has brought two people together at an unconscious level and what they would like to learn together and further develop in the course of their partnership.

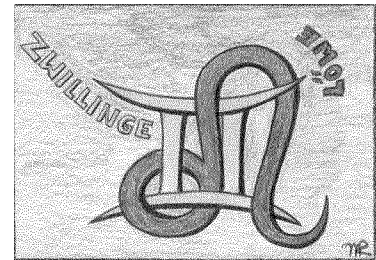

During your first encounter both of you were searching for new spheres of interest and knowledge. At a subconscious level you were on the look-out for a person you could talk with, communicate with, from whom you could learn something or discuss the many sides of life with. You are most interested in the thoughts, knowledge or daily experiences of your partner. For this reason, language and all media concerned with communication and information have great significance in your relationship.

Your main concern is not to be together all the time or to seal yourselves off in cozy togetherness. The exact opposite is much more likely. It is probable that you will not often be alone, and if this is the case, lengthy conversations will become absolutely necessary. If both or one of you should be constantly on the go, limiting the chances for daily contact, perhaps only the telephone or other means of communication can make a lively exchange possible. The matters both of you discuss and learn from one another can also be of interest for other people. Therefore, it is conceivable that you will pass on your knowledge to others, sooner or later.

The Most Important Sphere of Life

Even though the main theme of a relationship touches all spheres of life for both partners, one very particular area acquires special significance through this union. This area determines the life stage upon which the partners act, it determines the backdrop for the plot and, finally, it shows where the most intensive and formative experiences are possible for both individuals.

In your common activities coping with diverse ideologies, life philosophies, or confessional themes has a special significance. Education, cultured life and legal matters are also areas which might involve your energies in a significant way. Your relationship has the central task of developing a life perspective capable of transporting you beyond your previous experiences. The world around you tends to become too confining all too quickly. You require space and room to move - in an intellectual sense, as well. For this reason, you will often be preoccupied with the search for new opportunities to escape the prison of daily routine, perhaps by reading a great deal, furthering your education in some manner, conducting productive conversations, or by travelling together whenever possible.

IV. The Fundamental Nature of Your Relationship

Just as in the case of any solitary natural being, the energy generated by the union of two individuals possesses its own unmistakable character. It determines whether the two partners attempt to pursue their common interests dynamically and single-mindedly, or rather, cautiously and reservedly. Correspondingly, the fundamental nature of their relationship will become especially evident in one sphere of life, granting both individuals the opportunity to cope with the demands - together with chances and challenges - awaiting them there.

The beginning of a partnership is usually filled with a kind of magic. The partners feel strongly attracted to and often completely fascinated by one other. The capacity for fascination is especially high in your relationship. perhaps because each of you intuitively senses that its further course holds deep-reaching transformations in store. Together, both of you are in a position to enter unconscious territory, to part with self-made taboos and to let go of outmoded behavior patterns. Even when these processes involve internal crises, both of you will feel more alive, and above all, more authentic at the conclusion.

If you end up one day spending most of your time determining who has more authoritative influence or who can hold his breath the longest, both of you will have landed in a game of power and helplessness which cannot have a winner. Each of you will be forced to deal with your deep-seated fears of loss sooner or later, even if you attempt to establish mutual dependency patterns which make independent behavior difficult.

In this relationship John must especially take care not to abuse his influence over Jacqueline. He possesses the ability to trigger developmental processes in other persons which touch on their most sensitive wounds. Jacqueline is also not immune to this, because she might often feel her sense of security is threatened - especially if John denies her support and accompaniment.

Your relationship is characterized by concentration, perseverance, and sometimes, ambition. The duties and difficulties which will confront you, as well as your readiness to take on responsibilities, help both of you to grow. For this very reason, you will probably encounter obstacles and hindrances here more than in other relationships. Furthermore, a totally carefree attitude or simple, ingenuous joy in living will not often predominate in your relationship, though your explicit abilities will become all the more evident to establish a secure foundation for your lives with consistency, discipline and adherence to the essentials. In no case should you expect fortune to jump into your laps, although you should not allow yourselves to be discouraged by possible setbacks. The house which you build together at a symbolic level should also be in a position to offer both of you protection, comfort and repose. Provided you place stone upon stone without missing a space, and without neglecting the supporting walls or even the foundation due to carelessness or laziness, this house will never collapse. It may, however, take longer than planned to move in, but when you do, your domicile will be stable, secure and beautiful in a timeless sense.

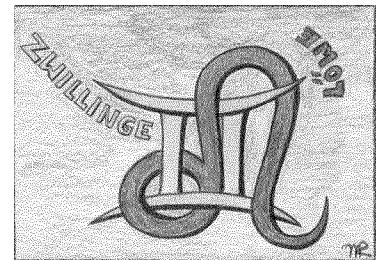

The light and dark sides of human relationships fascinate you so much - at least unconsciously - that you will be concerned with these more closely in the course of this partnership. Each of you is ready for intensive experiences so powerful and deep-reaching that they will be in a position to completely change you. This relationship makes you "partners in fate": each of you is prepared to accompany the other through the heights and abysses of existence, and each of you awaits the other with an important lesson. Therefore, it will be a vain attempt if you try to take this relationship in stride, or to live it in a casual and relaxed manner. Your souls seek the experience of dependency and captivity, as if following an inner compulsion, in order to learn to free themselves from the tangled web of guilt feelings, power and helplessness. You will be confronted with situations involving loss so that you can learn to "let go" of the other - at least regarding fixed conceptions of your partner. As long as you remain bound to a particular status quo in respect to the course of your relationship or your mode of interaction with one another, you will be taught a better lesson by fate. Life has its own laws and, in the end, heeds only inner truths. You are in a position to support each other in this search for inner truth to a great degree, and to shorten the journey. This will also help you deal with yourselves and other people in amore honest manner.

This relationship allows your original and experimental sides to find expression, and this might make you a somewhat unusual couple in the eyes of your fellows. You possess the confidence and ability to do things differently than the rest, and to find new forms of togetherness as a result. It is not the case that you are uninterested in a long-term relationship - it is merely vital that the partnership is not overly constrictive and it should not require predictable and typical behavior. Both of you can deal extremely well with surprises and sudden developments, on the other hand. The flexibility each of you possesses and uses to confront new situations will prevent unexpected events from throwing you off course.

If one examines the essence of your relationship more precisely, it becomes evident that - whatever difficulties you might encounter - you possess a unique ability to re-establish a harmonious and well-balanced situation. The strong ties between the two of you are, among other things, based upon the fact that your understanding and reason are predominantly in consonance with what each of you desires within the relationship on an emotional plane. Furthermore, you possess a good sense for what unites body and soul. You know intuitively when it is time to act or when you should abstain from action and allow matters to develop themselves. Each of you is able to incorporate your active and passive, male and female, as well as your adult and childlike sides into the relationship, discovering repeatedly that each of you complements the other in a wonderful manner.

V. The Emotional Sphere

Every relationship needs an atmosphere suitable to its own unique character in order to allow feelings to express themselves. The ability to communicate with the other partner on an emotional level, to surrender oneself to the other partner with trust, to accept intimacy and to enter into a caring relationship with one other is influenced by the respective childhood experiences. Nevertheless, the interaction between the two partners creates new possibilities which allow them to begin a dialogue between their deepest levels of being.

Sensual pleasures such as good food, a massage or lying in a fragrant summer meadow give both of you emotional nourishment. Your daily lives together may have their conflicts from time to time, but nothing is able to disturb your inner stability so easily as long as you can rely on the affection and trust of your partner, and as long as both of you have the necessary sensual feedback.

What you feel for each other does not have to be expressed in words. The secrets of your emotional world are much more enticing with all its anxieties and desires - you will be able to deal with these better in an intuitive manner drawing on your dreams and imagination, rather than attempting to use verbal communication and logic. It is possible that one of you has entered your partner's life in a subtle and inexplicable way in order to help him. To do this, it is not necessary that your partner is physically present the entire time. It is often enough to know that the other exists. When you are together, you most likely feel best in locations where you can be alone and undisturbed. Outsiders might have a difficult time grasping what holds the two of you together at a deeper level, and what you actually feel for one another. It might frequently be difficult even for the two of you to define what is motivating you internally. The contours of your souls blur to the point where it is difficult to separate reality from dreams.

John's ability to enter emotionally into Jacqueline's subconscious allows him to adopt the role of the therapist frequently. If he helps Jacqueline to better cope with her mood swings on a daily basis, John will also experience more about his own emotional life.

Even if you feel very bound to one another emotionally, it will prove difficult to allow these feelings to find expression in your conscious activity. This can lead to discussions and undertakings which are conducted without consideration of your true feelings. You then act as if your emotions exist in an isolated sphere, and that they only need to be considered when you are concerned with emotional issues alone. This can be disturbing or even hurtful for both of you, because neither of you is able to feel emotionally accepted and generally appreciated in such situations.

At first, it could be that neither of you has a concrete idea of what home and emotional security actually mean at a deeper level. Perhaps you possess very idealized conceptions of the family or living together - these notions could lose their aura when confronted with the realities of cohabitation, at the latest. Domestic reality will usually prove to be very different than your expectations, and it will probably not be an easy thing to accept this. This relationship offers you the opportunity to get at the bottom of the cause for your not wanting to look your domestic and emotional lives "in the eyes". John especially must learn to see his relationship to his mother in a different and clearer light. It is possible that anxieties and insecurities stem from your childhood and cause unclarities and chaos when they continue to be suppressed and denied.

VI. The Mental Sphere

For mutual understanding, it is necessary that the two partners can make themselves understood to each other. The ability to communicate, to maintain contact and an intensive, thinking interaction with the other partner determines the extent to which the one partner can respond to the needs of the other. Even when two individuals do not speak the same language in an intellectual sense, common interests, flexibility and openness can always build a bridge between them.

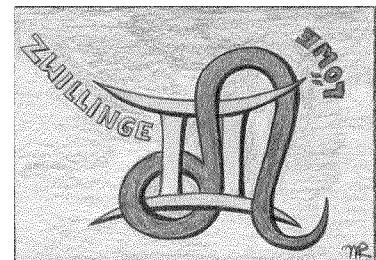

Often, it takes some time before both of you can get a real discussion off the ground. Either you see each other too infrequently to maintain a communicative exchange, or there are other factors which often complicate your personal interaction. You are able to discuss themes which interest both of you with a high degree of concentration and perseverance. Should one of you be in difficult circumstances, you will always find a ready ear and useful advice with your partner. Indeed, the serious and essential themes in life are your most frequent topics of conversation. Shallow and superficial matters are not worth the time needed to discuss them. You can rely on each other, because you strive to keep your promises and to fulfill your agreements.

In your thoughts and conversations, you are probably less concerned with the status quo than with what could come to be at some time in the future. This bestows you with the ability to help each other flee the banalities of daily existence from time to time. A certain lightness and your mutual desire to always think optimistically create an approach to life with which you can address even highly intellectual themes on a daily basis.

There might well be identifiable reasons why your communication often proves to be extremely difficult. It could be you see each other so infrequently that a continuous communicative exchange cannot take place. Even if you strive to maintain contact, you will first have to cope with and eventually overcome obstacles and hindrances. Perhaps one of you doubts your ability to communicate or is insecure in another way, and withdraws from conversations as a consequence. It could also be the case that your interests are very different and that you have great difficulties finding a topic of conversation interesting for both of you. The frustration which often results from your communication problems can also be a sign and a guide. You should not become discouraged too easily, instead you must search for a form of communication which suits both of you.

VII. Jacqueline's Role in the Relationship

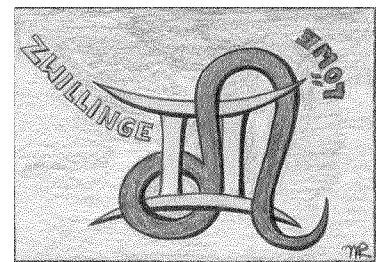

In a close and binding relationship where the partners either live together or spend a great deal of time together on a daily basis, the concerns which they contribute to the partnership will certainly become very evident. The less binding a relationship is, on the other hand, the less evident these themes will be in daily life. The following description will more precisely characterize the role which Jacqueline plays in this relationship, and above all, center on those themes which she will be concerned with in a deeper sense.

In the relationship with John, Jacqueline would like to demonstrate her sense of justice, idealism and generosity. This will succeed best if her general life circumstances permit it and if she feels generally contented. Most importantly, Jacqueline can learn to develop confidence and optimism in even difficult times during the course of this partnership. It is possible that she is concerned with questions regarding the meaning of life, or with religious or philosophical approaches. Freedom and independence of thought are important prerequisites for Jacqueline in her quest for meaning in life and wish to share her good fortune with other people. Even if she must pass through the deepest of valleys on her journey, in the end - like the phoenix from the flames - new horizons will appear.

Jacqueline will definitely contribute to a well-functioning daily or work routine, although she does not feel at her best at the center of attention. Physical presence as well as the open and direct defense of her interests are not among Jacqueline's strengths. In this relationship she often requires the possibility to retreat in order to regenerate internally on the one hand, and to deal more intensively with her desires, dreams and imagination on the other. Jacqueline derives meaning and fulfillment from the external world to a lesser degree. Happiness rests in a quiet corner for her, in solitude, far away from the rush of day to day life. It might be the case that she seldom expresses her opinions and convictions spontaneously and demonstratively, rather preferring to rely on her intuitive, empathetic and receptive nature.

Without conscious effort and by virtue of her idealism and generosity, Jacqueline is able to fascinate others in an extremely subtle manner and win their confidence. Therefore, it is especially important that she always takes care to use her strength of conviction for the good of other persons. She should not manipulate others consciously or unconsciously, and motivate them to do things which could be harmful to them in the end. Jacqueline's enormous inner strength also helps her demonstrate courage, self-confidence and optimism in times of crisis and phases of inner transformation. Her instinct for knowing when to let go of outdated life circumstances protects her from becoming implicated in dependencies which do not further her emotional and intellectual growth.

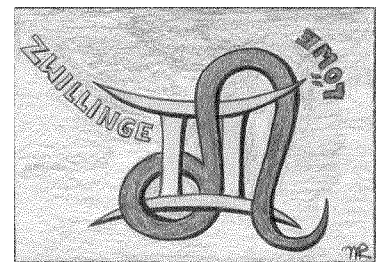

The relationship with John not only helps Jacqueline to represent her views and desires more clearly and penetratingly than usual, but also to become engaged in their realization with courage and confidence. John is able to motivate her to a tremendous degree and give her the necessary incentive to actually prove her abilities and continually develop her talents. John may also provoke her frequently, consciously or unconsciously, thus kindling her fighting spirit. This must not lead to friction and quarrels if Jacqueline looks more closely and recognizes the very positive function of John's offensiveness.

Nothing will be more boring to Jacqueline in this relationship than having to deal with "the same old thing" on a day to day basis. Instead, she requires a great deal of variety and freedom of movement in order to devote herself to her wide-ranging interests. Jacqueline is interested in the unique and the original above all. For this reason, Jacqueline probably feels drawn to people and situations with an unusual or even eccentric character - they will inspire her to part with typical ways of thinking and conventional paths from time to time, but also to follow her own ideals and visions in opposition to the status quo.

VIII. John's Role in the Relationship

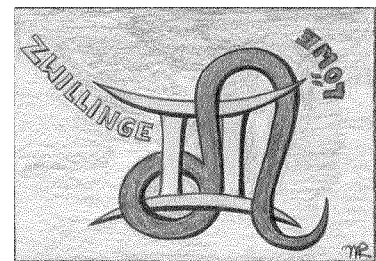

A description now follows of the role which John plays in your relationship. Here, too, those themes will be emphasized which he will be concerned with during the course of the relationship.

In the relationship with Jacqueline, John would like to demonstrate his versatility, knowledge and readiness to learn. Since both partners are united by diverse areas of interest, topics of conversation will hardly be lacking. However, it is extremely important for John to maintain a high degree of flexibility and mobility. His restless and busy sides are also activated in this relationship. For this reason, he will probably be on the go quite often, always ready to begin something new and seldom really relaxed or focused on one matter. A relationship with John could scarcely be boring. His agile mind, ability to transmit knowledge and experience to others, gregariousness, keen judgment as well as his openness in approaching other people makes a partnership with John a constantly enlivening interaction.

In the relationship with Jacqueline, John's restless spirit will begin a new journey. Freedom of thought - but also personal freedom and independence - are very important to John in this relationship. He will reject any and all curtailments in his freedom of movement as well as his desire for growth and expansion. Involvement with philosophical, religious or cultural themes could widen his world view tremendously, and also serve his search for meaning in general. Jacqueline can learn a great deal from John, provided she remains open and flexible, allowing herself to be inspired by John's curiosity and readiness to approach new areas of knowledge. In the end, this relationship will motivate both partners to expand their intellectual horizons and trod new paths with courage.

In the relationship with Jacqueline, however, John will also have to come to terms with the darker sides of a partnership. There may well be times when Jacqueline is intellectually or spatially removed from him, making it difficult to maintain any contact at all. Though there might be reasons for this which have no immediate relation to John, he could often feel refused, rejected or even abandoned as a result. As difficult as these phases may be, they will help John to develop inner stability and strength in the end, and to concentrate on those matters which really count in his interactions with other people. This process makes it inevitable for John to accept his own weaknesses and feelings of inadequacy. After he has become conscious of the situations in which he feels incompetent or unknowledgeable, or - for whatever reasons - unable to move freely and naturally, he will also obtain opportunities to effect necessary changes. The partnership with Jacqueline is an outright challenge for John to rethink previous opinions and views so that he can represent his convictions more clearly and decisively.

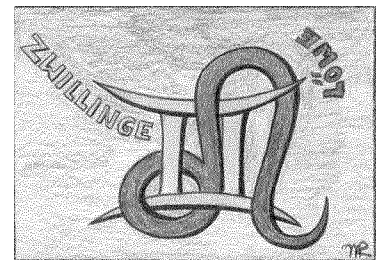

Appendix

Astrological Techniques

There are a number of astrological methods which enable us to view a partnership more effectively. The oldest method is that of horoscope comparison, called synastry. Here, two birth horoscopes are investigated and interpreted on the basis of shared aspects. Composite and Combined Horoscopes, on the other hand, are relatively new. Robert Hand is considered to be one of the pioneers of composite horoscope research. His comprehensive interpretative work, Planets in Composite, appeared in 1975. We owe the Combined Horoscope to the work of the Viennese astrologer Philip Schiffmann, and independently of him, the Englishman Ronald Davison - the "Horoscope for Two" is based on their research. In the English speaking world the Combined Horoscope is often called the 'Davison Relationship Chart'. Whereas the composite horoscope does not reflect an actual astronomical constellation, the Combined Horoscope unites the birth horoscopes of the partners in space and time, in a new and real constellation. That point in time is determined which lies exactly between the birth dates of the persons involved, while the geographical longitude and latitude are established in the same way. Mona Riegger has been investigating both interpretative possibilities since 1980 and published her findings for the first time in her book, Handbook of Combined and Composite Horoscope Interpretation. With the help of the Combined Horoscope, she is able to identify which role each partner occupies within the relationship and which opportunities for development present themselves during its further course.

For the interpretation of the "Horoscope for Two", however, Mona Riegger presupposes a high degree of commitment between the partners in question. The more casual the character of the partnership is, the more the interactive aspects and personality features described here recede in the background - the more intensive the relationship is, the more the partners will have to come to terms with the themes reflected in their common horoscope. The type of relationship is not the decisive factor. Even when a "Horoscope for Two" involving close friends, co-workers or even business rivals reveals a strong emphasis on emotional or domestic themes, or when professional themes are especially emphasized in an intimate relationship, it is worthwhile to come to an understanding of the matter at this deeper level. A professional rival can confront us with feelings of being threatened quite effectively, causing us to react emotionally in an extremely injured manner. Excessive rivalry and faulty decision-making are all too often a result of this process. In the interpretative passages, however, the author assumes a relationship which is positively affirmed ; for this reason, competitive relationships often "get away with too much".

Recurring Themes in Different Horoscopes

It becomes obvious when reading various "Horoscopes for Two" that certain themes recur and are interpreted in text blocks with a similar content. This is a necessary consequence of the computer text method utilized for casting the horoscope. The same factors (ascendant, house positions for planets ruling a sign, etc.) occur repeatedly in different horoscopes. First the synthesis of these various factors - in respect to the entire horoscope - allows every relationship to reveal its individuality and uniqueness.

The "Horoscope for Two" is an independent partnership horoscope which is cast on the basis of each partner's date of birth, but which makes no reference to individual themes in their respective birth horoscopes.
